

Bridgewater, Massachusetts

S.G.L. investigator George Bancroft was on a mission to research a story about an area called Bridgewater, Massachusetts. It was 1955 when the story came out of a possible alien encounter. The S.G.L. will investigate such events in hopes it will find useful technology. To hide from the outsiders, the investigator will often disguise themselves as members of known UFO groups. They feel sure their presence will be taken lightly without undue involvement from locals. Most encounters unfortunately, have been with the ones called the Greys. These little boogers are a disagreeable sort. The Stavrosian community would rather avoid contact as they are historically not friendly.

George's family has been part of the S.G.L. ever since their arrival in America in the 1940s. George visited several sites in the Bridgewater area. He spent three years walking the forest and wetlands looking for any sign of alien presence. He kept meticulous notes. His reports stated that from 1955 to 1958 he studied the areas of "Little Cedar Swamp", "Carver Pond", "South Brook" and the Bridgewater State Forest region as well as an assortment of creeks and forested areas around Bridgewater. George Bancroft reported finding some signs of alien intrusion. He also wrote about other strange creatures he had encountered. However, his focus was on the mission. The S.G.L. in New York had received a report dated June 11, 1958. It was the last thing George ever sent. He was never heard from again.

Two S.G.L. men were dispatched to the area to look for George. Some time later a small notebook was found in the area called the Wetlands by a group of children playing there. The phone number of the S.G.L. office in New York was written on the inside cover. The caller only said they found the notebook. Once recovered by the men in the field the notebook was taken back to the office. The last entry in the notebook read, "I'm out of time. They are here for me."

The notebook is kept in Maine at the home office Library.
