

Falkland Island

In 1979 Paul Stone of the British Special Air Service had been assigned to investigate a group of people that had been living as British subjects on the Falkland Islands. These people were a very closed society that did not mingle with other local islanders. What had brought them to the attention of the S.A.S. was strange communications between the Falklands and an office in London, much of which had not been done by normal channels.

Paul arrived in Argentina following his initial investigation. He met with Agent Joann Hall, a British remote viewer. Together they would try to find out what and who had been contacting the office in London the S.A.S. was investigating. The idea that Alien life forms may be among us was introduced by the British government. This was the premise of the whole investigation. The S.A.S. had tried to tap into the communications ever since the idea that someone, I.E., the Stavrosians, could possibly actually exist. This was a combination of wonder and fear, as well as a search for technology.

This would be a treasure for the minister of the military. Paul's investigation brought him to a point where he had to make a decision. Did he think that an alien presence could actually be not only on Earth, but in Britain as well. Paul was not going to let himself believe anything so far-fetched. His superiors were not so ready to buy into the facts of the case.

Paul, along with Joann, took a trip out to the island. She spent a week trying to locate anyone that she could meld with. It was late at night when Joann got her first contact. Several more tries over several days when she heard a voice in her head. "Meet me at the pub in Darwin next to the water". Joann went on her own to meet whoever the voice was.

She sat at a small table near the back of the room. A man walked up to her, he pulled out a chair then sat down. He told her his name was Taylor Evens. (We do not know if that was his real name). He wanted to know why she was asking so many questions about his group. She asked him if he could talk openly. Taylor said only if she could keep an open mind. Neither knew how the other would act.

Taylor told her that even though she didn't know her own self, he was going to tell her about her own truth. Joann listened as Taylor told her in detail of her own connection to the Stavrosian people; how her remote viewing capabilities along with Mind Communication were two of her greatest Stavrosian traits, her gifts.

The S.G.L. had been monitoring her abilities for over three years. If it were not for her connection to the S.A.S., the S.G.L. would have contacted her sooner. Now that she was part of this investigation, it became imperative to make contact in hopes to influence her decision to help protect the Stavrosian people from the British government, the S.A.S. and from a prying world media. Joann was not so easy to persuade, and it would take several more meetings before she came to her own discovery. She now had to lead Paul Stone away from finding the truth about the Falkland Island Stavrosians, as well as her own newfound identity.

Her report was simple, nothing to see here. She convinced Paul that it must be some anomaly as far as anyone sending communications from such a desolate place like this sheep covered rock. Paul was happy enough to leave that cold rock of an island.

As for Joann, she returned home to find a Stavrosian family she herself could join in with to celebrate First Life. In 2021, 42 years after her own discovery, Joann came to America to celebrate First Life with a family in North Carolina on Lake High Rock. As for Paul Stone, he never followed up with or returned to the Falkland Island. He rejected the premise of alien life. He, as with his superiors, stopped their investigation. Why keep looking for what can't be here!

Joann has retired from government work. She is now an active remote viewer for the S.G.L. in London. She keeps in contact with her host family in Lexington North Carolina. The S.G.L. satellite office in High Point was closed down in September of 2020. They hope to establish another office in or around Statesville for a more favorable location to maintain secrecy.

S.G.L. Researcher
G. Stavros
Assisted by Joann Hall

<https://stavrosianalienancestry.com/stavrosianarchives.html>