

The Carpenter

During George H. Bush's presidency, 1989-1993, was a time of UFO acknowledgments in the G.H. Bush administration. It was in the spring of 1990 when a group of men from an agency called Majestic picked up a man in Virginia although the U.S. has kept a steadfast denial of extraterrestrial presence on Earth. This man named Dorset was taken into custody and questioned for several days. The agency was trying to extract information from old Dorset on any and everything he may know on extraterrestrial presence on Earth.

Dorset was the son of Jon Olmsted, a Stavrosian carpenter by trade. Jon came to America in 1939. He worked as a private contractor retiring in 1979 at 70 years of age. Dorset stayed in his father's business and ran it until he was fifty years old. Dorset was quietly working, as did his father, as a member of the Stavrosian Guard. He was active in helping find Stavrosian families homes and jobs to get settled in their new locations.

The men of Majestic were interested in finding the locations of one or all of the Stavrosian libraries. They wanted to secure a list of names showing the known families. When it was clear just what Majestic wanted, it was an all-out effort to keep them away from any libraries.

Dorset was given the job of misleading the Majestic men away from finding any real information. Dorset came up with the idea to leave clues for the S.G. to find. This was to draw them away from the truth. In May of 1990, he had used an old warehouse as a false address for his remail service as he was once again covering up his tracks.

The men of Majestic caught up to him at Norfolk international Airport before he could board a plane. Dorset was a good carpenter; he was a better actor. He was taken to a naval station near there. Dorset went under extensive questioning until he felt it was safe to pretend to crack under the pressure. Dorset gave them information on a false group living in the hills of West Virginia, in an area called Richwood. Majestic sent out other agents to check the area out. Dorset was sent to Washington D.C. for holding and more questioning until they heard back from the other team.

When he arrived in D.C., Dorset was met by security personal. He was grilled even more about alien presence, but he held his own. Dorset was able to keep the secret, he gave them nothing. Dorset's family kept trying to see him. They were unable to get permission to visit him.

Dorset was held by the Majestic people until 1994. His release was signed by the then president Bush at the end of his term in offices. Dorset moved his family to Madrid, Spain. Here they would live a life of obscurity.

Update: No one was ever found in the area Dorset told them about. The S.G.L. was able to help Dorset start a new life. All the people Dorset helped are safe; their families are fitting into mainstream life. The agency Majestic is still very much out there looking for us due to the good work of the Stavrosian Guard. Those that try to find us are no closer than they were in 1990.
